CHAPTER V After the superintendent had reverently bowed his head before the Unknown God, in communion with his thoughts on human origin and destiny, he revived, in memory, the story of his personal evolution, tracing it as far back as he could, so as to meet, as it were, his inmost self, and read in the past pages of his life the destiny which probably awaited him in the future. He thought of his father, the late major of the garrison artillery, one of those indefinite t} DEGREESpes which marked the beginning of the century; a character composed of many parts, like a conglomerate; the refuse of past epochs, collected at random after the great explosion at the end of last century, and cemented together. He believed in nothing, for he had seen with his own eyes that everything passes, that everything comes again; he had seen nations trying every form of government, greeting new systems with shouts of acclamation and abolishing them in a few years time; he had seen abolished systems resumed and lauded as epoch-making discoveries. Finally lie had clung to existing facts as the only comprehensible verities, indifferent to the question as to whether they had been called into existence by a governing will--which was improbable--or a group of accidents--which was fairly certain but unwise to affirm. A few years at the University had converted him to the pantheism of the Neo-Hegelians, a clever reverse of the philosophy which...
