Nearly all the VAST CELLARAGE FOR THE PISH. 149 houses have stone steps outside, leading to the first floors, where the families live, while the ground floors are occupied by the fish-cellars. The latter spread through the inhabited parts of the houses exhalations which are far from being agreeable, especially in the pilchard season; but the fishermen scent in this fish an odour quite as good as another--the fragrance of gain and prosperity. The buildings intended to receive and prepare the pilchard attain considerable proportions at St. Ives. I convinced myself of this on visiting the cellars and stores of Mr. Boletho. These cellars, covered by a gallery supported by iron columns, open on a square yard, and resemble cloisters as much through their size as through the solidity of the architecture. Here you find mountains of salt brought from Spain; two pits, from...
