Not illustrated. 1910 Excerpt: .a foundation for a very large planer, which foundation had been built twice before, and twice failed to sustain the weight placed upon it. Upon removing the old foundation an apparently good bed of gravel was found. The engineer was not satisfied and ordered the excavation to be continued. Passing through this gravel bed the remains of an old cellar were encountered, which had been filled in with worthless rubbish which had been the cause of the former failures. With this removed a solid gravel bed was found upon which a successful foundation was built. Fourth. Still another case was that of a factory building located on ground that was slightly lower than much that surrounded it, and the question of drainage was overlooked. There were no sewers available, and to construct one would cost half as much as the building itself. The only plan left was to construct a large underground cess-pool or receiving basin for the sewage of a factory of three hundred employees, which was necessarily expensive and also difficult to maintain in a sanitary condition. This difficulty finally led to the abandonment of the factory, as it was found after a few years that the conditions were so unsanitary as to be the cause of much sickness among the employees, and upon the complaint of the physicians the Board of Health took up the matter and ordered the building to be vacated as a manufacturing building, and the receiving basin or cess-pool...
