William told us which way to turn, and he said it would bring us to Wheatley Lane. His wife s grandfather, he said, was buried there, so we would have him get down, and see the grave. We tied up my pony, and got an old man to hold the horses. Nora and I walked about and read what was on the tombstones;--very old stones they were. And not without uncouth rhymes, I suppose, said Isabel. There was a sun-dial, too, at the corner of the old chapel, instead of a clock. It seemed so strange. Ah, yes, said Mr. Moseley, I remember it, just at the corner of the chapel, as you say. Not so picturesque as the old garlanded one in the Swedish churchyard! The one which the poet described? asked Mrs. Moseley. Yes, the one...
